Vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF) and its receptors are thought to be critical mediators of angiogenesis and tumor growth in solid tumors. Thus, targeting angiogenesis is a potentially promising new strategy for cancer treatment. Tumors have increased VEGF production and are dependent on angiogenesis for growth and metastasis. This dependence makes them particularly susceptible to antiangiogenic therapy. Preclinical data suggest that antiangiogenic therapy is effective in a number of solid tumor models, although clinical studies have been disappointing. However, there are indications that antiangiogenic treatment is more effective in some tumor types and in disease settings. The past few years have seen a great deal of progress in the design and evaluation of antiangiogenic therapy in ovarian cancer, as
