

Does anybody have any advice as to what I should do? Has he somehow managed to install X5 onto his computer? Is it still activated or should I just call Corel tech support and activate it for him? This is upsetting my wife because she just spent R1000+ on this program and I really don't want to bother with his company! Thanks! Here is what I think should happen. Your boss should have used the software that is already installed on his computer. Or, it's wrong of him to not. Both versions of X5 are different programs and he should have done a re-install of X3 which he already bought, or he should have just bought the US version and made his software license transferable (but that's not possible). These are the really easy answers to your question. (Yes, that means you, customer service person. You had NO business asking this question. It's up to the customer to choose to buy that software and then activate it. It's not Corel's job to "maintain" that software.) So, he either has X5 on his computer (despite the fact he bought X3), or he activated it and forgot (if he already did this). These are the answers and the only advice. There are other details to this question, but you clearly have a Corel customer service person making things more difficult for you. A: All versions of CorelDraw up to X4 are 32bit programs. In a PC running Windows, the OS reserves lots of RAM for the Windows itself. If an application is not part of Windows then it is reserving less RAM. This means that if you install X5 and allocate lots of RAM to it then it will start to slow down the performance of Windows. And if the RAM allocation is too high then Windows will not be able to run the programs. Not having an OS available to run software means that you as the user are expected to be able to supply the RAM allocation requirements. There is no straightforward way to save such a situation other than backing up all of your data, installing X3 on a different PC, and then restarting with the new X3 licence. That would require that you can afford to spend several hundred hours of your time doing so. I'm Tired of the Blame Game I'm Tired of the Blame Game The blame game is a ridiculous pastime. It's a
